

Garry Davis Camps at U. N. Door; Awaits 'World Citizen' Recognition

Ex-Pilot Who Renounced U. S. Rights Beds Down Outside Paris Palace—Officials Note Lack of Rule for International Loyalty

By A. M. ROSENTHAL

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

PARIS, Sept. 12—Garry Davis, 26-year-old former bomber pilot, who renounced his United States citizenship three months ago, carried his bedding to the Palais de Chaillot today and said he would stay there until the United Nations recognized him as "the first citizen of the world."

United Nations officials were taking the whole thing quietly. They stayed away from Mr. Davis all day, but toward evening one high executive said he would drop over and have a talk with him.

"I will just have to tell him that the way we are set up, there is no such thing as international citizenship," said the official.

Mr. Davis arrived early at the Palais carrying:

A bed roll, a portfolio, a knapsack, a portable typewriter, a letter from United States authorities noting that he had given up his citizenship and a letter from French authorities saying that his visa had expired and that he must leave.

Dressed in his Army officer's uniform—stripped of all insignia—Mr. Davis walked into the modernistic temporary building set up by the French for a cafeteria and administrative offices. He announced that he would stay there until the United Nations delegates "recognized their responsibility."

Cafeteria officials said flatly that Mr. Davis could not eat there because he was not a United Nations staff member. Mr. Davis said he did not want to break the regulations, and a friend brought him fruit and a sandwich. He said he would make his bed on the wooden steps of the building.

As Mr. Davis told his story, he had renounced his United States citizenship both because he believed every man should be a world citizen and as a gesture against war.

"I have no passport, and the only place I can go—now that the French have refused to extend my visa—is international territory, and the Palais is international territory," he said.

Mr. Davis spoke with the utmost intensity on the subject of world citizenship. If 50,000,000 Americans took the same step he did, the politicians would be forced in the direction of world government, he declared.

Mr. Davis, son of Meyer Davis, the United States bandleader, said he was determined to stay as long as possible because he had "no other place to go." His plans did not stop at the Palais de Chaillot, he said, but he would not comment on what else he was going to do. States, bogged down.